Marxism on the City and Capital

By Cornel West and Shomit Sirohi

Introduction – on What is Called City Life with Sirohi's love for puns and jokes as Marx himself loves the poetry aspect of his works and not the scientific break of Althusser as much as this.

In fact announce the city's idealism, with in fact some shops and stores peppered across the city with in fact a number of arcades, with a dash of rum buying and wealthy drinking and Arcades and flaneuring with a number of remarks on its maintainence and high labouring qualities and even a pronouncement of the beauty of plazas and even jokes on the nature of flaneuring and drinking coffee as black people do in India these days with exuberance on Badiou who himself, Cornel West here that man who loves Marx as in fact Sirohi and this type of truth it produces that life is just a bunch of things to do on his own like living in a housing sector and going to buy some groceries and meet his lovers is in fact an idea of truth.

Such simplicities which then produces a fashion life for women as well as a college and hospital to go along with the crises of daily life and the infinite production of the companies and their software idealism to get along with each other – hic Rhoda hic Salta after this mess we create in the world of ideas and many such themes we call a novelistic idea of cities and capital.

I. Cornel West

In fact I mean Marx is best read as a humourist who then is about the simple doctrine of Being, Essence and Concept in Hegel which is converted to materialist conceptions of history in the key book German Ideology which then is about advancement in cities and backwardness in countrysides and a number of sketches Sirohi argues of the city and its portmantreaux and even tableaux which then becomes tropes of city life which is maintained by the city bureaucrat Sirohi knows and has met as his Uncle which then is the whole idea of black lives in this poem which then is how Sirohi lives Marx at his best and expects a crisis as fun politics in fact of a mass protest which doesn't happen in India much because in fact it is busy working on all aspects of its city and economics – with the recent breakthrough on ecological living ideas and living economics coming across as in fact such a beautiful morning.
